

Nonstandard statistical analyses using distances and geometry

Current biological data come as complex heterogeneous structures which necessitate new representations as composed objects for which statistics are available using distances. I will show examples from applied work combining the analysis of cell images, brain images, and microbiome data with covariates that capitalize on the use of carefully chosen distances.